But that email, from a person claiming to be Schultz, now appears to have been a small part of one such meddling attempt.
A person who identified themselves as Bernadett Plaschil, an associate editor at Peace Data, told Reuters via email: "We're really confused by these accusations and deny all of them." The person declined to speak via phone or video call.
OLD SCHOOL TACTICS
"There was an over-stated political angle put into my stories," said one journalist who wrote for Peace Data about Turkey and the case of WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange.
Russia's use of fake organizations to ensnare unwitting agents and activists as part of its propaganda efforts dates back to the Soviet Union, said Thomas Rid, a professor at Johns Hopkins University and author of Active Measures, a book about political warfare.
As efforts to catch online influence operations have increased since 2016, "defaulting back to some of the old school tactics appears to be what they are doing to try to stay hidden," he said.
Walters said her experiences showed the importance of improving public awareness about efforts to deceive people online.
